The task was to select one out of two doors which leads to a series of patterns of six house cards. Four versions of the task were used, in the first two of which the 'learning phase' is divided into two stages, the second of which being a test of the accumulated amount of knowledge and retention of the task. In the other two versions the task was divided into three stages, the second of which was devoted to memory testing. Significant correlations were found between the amount of knowledge and memory achieved and the different stages of the task. On the basis of the results obtained and of studies previously carried out by the author, a model was presented which allows the explanation of the relationships between the two variables and the process by which the 'acquired knowledge' is memorized. The importance of the memory component softwareQ: Why do Ava and Roku have the same last name? Both Roku and Ava are adopted siblings. But to me it seems obvious that they share the same last name. Why does Hiro have to bring it up for them? Is there really a difference in the way the A-List recognises the way they do? I hope this isn't too broad, but the question is about the different family relations and the different closeness and level of awareness of biological parents and adoptive parents. It's a theme that's reinforced a lot by the other examples. A: It's an interesting choice by the writers, but I think it's because of the level of intimacy they had with each other. If you think about it, Roku and Ava are siblings in two ways: one because they were born into the same family, and the other because they were born into the same family as one another. Ava's mother is a very influential person in their lives, but she has no idea about the other little girl. Roku's mother is very normal, but is aware of the other girl and a very close with her. In the pilot, Ava's mother is kind of the reason Roku was adopted, and she's the one who could really see Roku and their relationship. But if we look a little farther back, it's interesting that both babies were born in the same hospital room. It could be coincidence, but it feels like it was a deliberate choice that has a reason. A: There are a few possible reasons: It was intentional to represent their close relationship. Although it's not stated in the show, I assume the adoptive parents understand their relationship and are aware of Ava as the daughter of one of their own. They don't even need to call her by name, they know that she's the other kid. It was just easier for the writers, personally I'd have called them Roku and Ava. It's just a cool name. That's how I chose to call my kids, although they were not adopted. A: I suspect it has to do with taking a clue from the regular world, where siblings have the same first and last name. (I'm not positive.)
