The invention relates to a process for the purification of oils by adsorption of extractive impurities on zeolites. The invention also relates to a process for the purification of oils by adsorption of extractive impurities on zeolites in a continuous column. In the separation of various types of oils by distillation, the oils are heated in a distillation column so that the various volatile components of the oils vaporise and separate from each other into a column overhead and into a column bottom. The column overhead and the column bottom are generally separated from each other by some form of separation device, for example a bubble diffuser. Thereafter, various fractions are taken off the column bottoms by using a skimmer. Each fraction is then led to a storage tank or pump and is circulated from the storage tank through a heat exchanger where the fraction is heated before it is sent to the distillation column. The overhead from the distillation column is generally led to one or more distillation columns to distil out the solvent fraction. The bottom fraction, which is generally rich in unwanted impurities, is generally led to a filter or to a decanter for separation of the oil phases, which are then led to storage tanks. The distillation columns and the storage tanks are generally arranged in a so-called evaporative tower in which heat exchange takes place between the oil flowing through the column and the oil flowing through the heat exchanger. In the above-mentioned separation, the oil is generally heated to a temperature of 90-100.degree. C. to obtain a distillate with a high quality in view of its ability to be used as fuel. However, a smaller quantity of fuel is required as the oil is heated, so that the recovery rate of fuel oil is reduced. It is known from U.S. Pat. No. 5,360,544 that water can be used instead of oil in the preparation of fuel oil from oil. However, use of water would require a process in which heating is obtained from outside of the column, for example by a steam boiler. FILED
