We demonstrate how the capability of digital holography to record and probe wave fields at different wavelengths simultaneously provides a path to an understanding of the three-dimensional (3D) fluorescence spectra in polydisperse emulsions. Digital holograms of polystyrene latex microspheres diluted in pure oil were measured at 974 and 585 nm (red and green) with a wavelength-switching configuration. The 3D wave field is reconstructed at two wavelengths, which reveal a bivariate Gaussian intensity profile for the sample fluorescence. The angular spectrum of this intensity profile can be calculated and leads to a multi-wavelength version of the standard three-dimensional spectroscopy equation. In the limit of equal sample and reference, which is valid for particle sizes much smaller than the wavelength, the spectroscopy equation is reduced to the fluorescence equation, as expected for a standard fluorescence measurement. However, this approach is valid only in the limit of a wavelength reference and cannot be used to infer particle size. Tales of the Excluded: A weekend in Jerusalem I like to read.
