Biblical Fortress Dungeon There were no dinosaur fossils, since the Cretaceous period ended at the K-T boundary. By then, the world was blanketed in ice and the dinosaurs were already extinct. But there was a mighty dinosaur-like creature, that was still living, in the sea-covered continent. The city was named Aranyapura, the city of king Ravana, and it was an ancient city. It had a magnificent castle. There was a fortress called "Aristocrat's Heaven" that protected the city. The people of the city were prosperous. They were equal to kings and princes. There were 10 Kings, so in all, they were 40 men. They lived off the riches of the city. The city was called Varanasi, the city of the Gods, and was a holy city. There were numerous temples, a famous one called "Sri Peetha Peetha", and a magnificent idol of the God Siva. It was the greatest symbol of the Gods. It was also the place where Shiva and Ganga, God and Goddess of all rivers, met and mingled with each other. There was a large rock known as "Surya Tirtha", a holy fountain, that Shiva had blessed. It was in this city that he had done countless of miracles. There were 100 streets leading to the tirtha, and it was said that everyone, who went there, could be fulfilled. The city was considered as the greatest place, since it was the birthplace of Lord Shiva. People from all over the world came to the city to worship. It was famous for its "Coo-shanat", a medicinal liquor, that was very soothing to the eyes, and also good for one's stomach. There were many temples, and Keshav Mahadev temple, was the most famous, since Shiva was born here. But as time passed by, the King built more houses on the banks of river Ganga, which led to the Surya Tirtha, and the life of the people declined. All the families were mixed, but there were still many poor people in the city. They were all gathered together, and it was like a family. But the street children of the city were not a part of this family. They had to live a life of suffering.

What's new in DUSK - Official Soundtrack:

: The Divine World of Chinese Buddhism by Richard J. Smith New York: Columbia University Press, 1996. 376 PP. $17.95 [96]
Not many years ago Western scholars who took interest in the subject of religion thoroughly dismissed Asian religion as a useless bit of trivia. While there were, of course, many good reasons to do so (including the old chestnut that the West takes all of its values from the Greeks and Buddhism from the Indians), the exclusive emphasis given to theology and all things "Christian" has created an even more startling gap between the West and the East. The colonialist hankering for "saving the natives" has frequently led to the wholesale dismissal not only of their sacred beliefs but also the very premise of it - rational belief in a spiritual God. The sheer number of societies that make no sense to the West is really astounding. Is there anything that we simply can't dismiss? And if these beliefs have taken hold in every major part of the human race as vast as the planet, what does it matter? It doesn't. SUN GOD, AMARTA NEYFOUS EXPRESSED AS PLAINTIFF One of the most remarkable things to me about the nature of Asian religion is the fact that it doesn't leave the devotees feeling like they've been tricked. With both Christianity and Islam, it's a deceptively simple question - how on Earth do you get into heaven? You're forgiven a lot of your sins, just what you need to get a payoff. The central thrust of the "God of the philosophers" - Jesus; Muhammad, the New Moon Moriah (whatever name you want to give to Jesus' followers) - is to do at least one thing: to explain to the world the miracle of conditional love. The world has to be shown that the Divine is first and foremost a great person. Wishing to see that the divine can be seen to be whimsical also serves this end. The skeptic is on a tightrope walk and the God of the philosophers is offering to teach them not only a way down but the secret of how to climb back up to the side of it. It's well worth taking such offers. The Buddha not only gives this same message and explanation, he explains that it is the entire basis of our existence and the source of all our suffering. The Buddha taught that all beings - no matter how angry, unhappy, or scared - are essentially the same as all other beings

By the year 2025, over 50 percent of the worlds population lives on the streets. While the rest of the world enjoys luxury and leisure, the cities skyline is a monument to murder. Forests of a billion redwood trees now blanket South America, with oil, toxic sludge, and garbage covering the thin topsoil. In other nations, other cities lie in ruin, battered by runaway weather, infectious diseases, and a crippling population decline. No continent on Earth is safe from The Cloud. OTHER INFORMATION: In December of 2000 we at the Stardock Entertainment Group teamed up with our partner, Interplay Entertainment, to produce the first of what would eventually become a series of Biker games, End Of Nations. Developed in partnership with FASA Interactive and published by Interplay, End Of Nations provided gamers with a fascinating new vision of a near-future world. Following it's sensational success, we brought this award-winning series to a close in order to pursue other high-growth game-development projects. While End Of Nations was completed prior to my departure from Stardock, with the demise of Interplay, we decided to continue work on the Biker series. After a protracted and exhaustive search for a developer with our established development capabilities, the decision was made to return to a group of talented artists and designers that we have long considered to be the best in their field. In an effort to show that we were committed to developing multi-platform games, we decided to implement an engine on all our future games, which has allowed us to jump-start development on our next game, Intrepid. It's been 16 months now and we're just getting warmed up. We have developed a team of talented game developers, provided them with a high-performance platform, and are now working on our
