A simple and intuitive tool for editing the metadata of your documents.HCN::Binary A number of common applications require very low-level, low-performance data capture. This data is often saved to regular text files, spreadsheet, as JSON or even CSV files. It can be of any size, and the storing app may be a simple plain text viewer or may be a hard-drive powered database. In the case of HCN::Binary, we simply need a converter to transform our data into a binary format that can be persisted in a std::vector object and loaded into our database. This data can be used for rendering graphics in our list page. HCN::RasterFactory HCN::RasterFactory is a wrapper around CGAL::Triangulation_3_in_3_D and CGAL::Bbox_3_in_triangulation_3_d to read the scan data as triangles into a std::vector>. We can then easily write this into a CSV for persistence. HCN::RasterFactory also has two functions that are exposed to us to load and save the triangles. Now that we have a way to store our data, we want to be able to load our data. HCN::Binary works great, but it is a little slow to load large amounts of data. This slow load time is the major reason for adding HCN::RasterFactory. HCN::ListFile HCN::ListFile is a wrapper around std::list that stores a std::vector into it. We can do a binary search to find a list item that matches the desired properties of the data, and we can load the list file data into our database. We can also load a list file from a file. This makes it easy to store a large amount of data and make the data remotely accessible from a file. HCN::User HCN::User is a class that defines a user object. It holds several properties, like the user's name, and a map of per-user data. This object stores the data in a Binary object, so it can be saved into a file and loaded back into a list file. HTML This tutorial was written using the prototype found at HCN::Binary
