Effect of Streptomyces gilvinus G-25 and its organic solvent extracts on the estrogen-like receptor beta expression in ER-positive MCF-7 cells. Many previous studies demonstrated the estrogenic effects of Streptomyces. However, the estrogen-like activity of Streptomyces strains is sometimes problematic. The present study aimed to develop a method to differentiate the estrogenic activity of Streptomyces strains based on their effect on the expression of estrogen receptor-beta (ERbeta). A method was developed to generate streptomycete extracts using (1) dichloromethane and methanol and (2) acetone.

Strains of Streptomyces gilvinus produced organic solvent extracts that stimulated the expression of ERbeta in MCF-7 cells in a dose-dependent manner. This effect was quantitatively measured with a gene reporter assay. The organic solvent extracts stimulated the expression of ERbeta in a cell-free system. This finding suggests that the active ingredients of organic solvent extracts stimulate the ERbeta-mediated signaling pathway. Our results indicate that organic solvent extracts of S. gilvinus G-25 can be used to assess the estrogenic activity of microorganisms and that they potentially serve as useful alternative materials for phytoestrogens. C-terminus of an Anterior Gradient-2-Like Protein From Sea Anemone Causes Anal Birth in a Natural Assemblage of Members of the Endoparasite Symbiosis Group. The sea anemone Entacmaea quadricolor is a host species that is sympatric with the ectoparasite Pseudophyllodermasponge, which utilizes the sea anemone as a host.

The surface of the pseudophyllodermasponge shows a dense accumulation of symbiotic bacteria at the columnar epithelial cells of the external body wall. By subtractive hybridization of bacterial 16S rRNA cDNAs, we identified a cDNA clone with a sequence highly similar to the C-terminus of anterior gradient-2-like proteins. This molecule expressed in Escherichia coli as a recombinant protein was shown to induce the formation
