The first thing you notice about Damage Control is the originality and attention to detail. There really is no other game out there like it. Damage Control is very simple, you can play it with up to 8 people over a LAN, or over the internet in a single player battle. If you don't fancy playing against real people you can always battle yourself. Because Damage Control is in a alpha state it's not going to be bug free, so don't worry if you see a bug in it or if your tool gets stuck on a particular part of the ship! It's all part of the game, as should be your ship! It really is about playing and enjoying the game though, Damage Control is really a game you can play with your mates at the dinner table, or play solo when you just want to relax and enjoy a game. Key Features The first thing you will notice in Damage Control is the realism. There really is no other game like it, but it does look and feel a bit like Prince of Persia. This, of course, makes it look rather good to play. Secondly, you will notice that there are no AI controlled enemies and that the fight is very much between you and your ship. I want to stress this very much, you have total control over the ship. You can start the game on your ship and instantly begin battle, or leave it to "sleep" and then use it later while you are further along the stage. You can also kick out at the enemies from the ship. There are no AI controlled enemies, there is no preset mission. You are free to do whatever you wish. There are only two objectives in the game (see the next section), but you can only achieve one of them. It's as if you are on a ship, away from the safety of known space, and you need to figure out how to get back home. The two objectives are to Get home! and Make It Home!. In the game's single player campaign, there will be various levels to play. In all of the levels we will be introducing stages. You will be carrying out a task, get to a destination and you will be able to use the stage to achieve the second objective. The first level isn't quite as complicated as it sounds, but you will soon begin to notice the stage structure and the game mechanics that you are expected to play with. As the game progresses there will be more levels and more objectives. Most levels will have more c9d1549cdd

The 'Poesie' heiress by Tom Pratt If you walk around Budapest today, you will see an old workshop in front of the Hungarian Academy of Sciences. On one side is the Old Town hall; the other, the green plots which protected their yew trees, the paintings of Gáspár Berényi and Sándor Kisfaludi, and one still unfinished monument, the monument to the national poet, Imre Kertész. In the back of the old workshop, something unusual was discovered, in the ground: a kind of cellar built under the basement level and hewn out from the rock. The floor of this floor corresponds to the cellar floors, right before the open air sink, in the rest of the workshop. After some dust building and reading books, we went in. It was cool and the walls were still bone dry. The first things that are behind all sarcophagi is a reddish wood, on the vaults of the ceiling, the floor and the walls. Standing above, we saw some markings and signs - pale yellow and brown. The area of the dig was a circle, approx. 100 cm inside with a diameter of 120 cm. We walked up some stairs, over the poles that kept the rotten wood from falling, down some narrow paths and came across some interesting things: A headless hand. A skeleton with its bones tied in separate bundles. A skull which was completely burnt. A woman lying on her right side in two parts, close to a wall. A man made of concrete, rotting, lying face upwards. Some pictures of a face have been scratched on the walls using limestone. There were three pictures of the same man, two men and a woman. The inscription was: 1855-1912 "Pegasi" [Birds]. The last picture of a woman is so beautiful, so extraordinarily beautiful, very un-Hungarian, however. Her lips not only purple red, but broken and reduced. At the bottom of the sarcophagus, one could find two jaws of crocodiles. The whole place was unpolished, the colours faded and the grey was not even the same. We tried our best to document the traces that were present in the room. Drinking chamomile tea and burning a couple of French cigarettes in the sun,
