manager to get the link. This invention relates to guide string and, more particularly, to apparatus and methods for tensioning guide strings in surveying operations such as levelling and determining offsets. In the earth surveying art, guide strings are typically made up of multiple sections of links joined together to form the string. Guide string is typically guided along a measured distance from a point of departure to a point of arrival. The links may be of various lengths

and diameters, such
that sections of the string are not simply joined end-to-end.

Typically, guide strings are maintained in tension, and the tensioning may vary depending on the distance or length of the guide string, such that the guide string is flexed to tension the

guide string to a
desired magnitude.
Guide strings that are used to control a mechanical
mechanism, such as a theodolite, or a
mechanical rig that is used to control

movement of a vehicle, such as a truss-mounted camera or trolley, are typically tensioned by a tractor. The tractor is guided to a desired point and pulls the guide string from that point. Guide strings are also often used to guide or tension a string of survey instruments, such as a surveyor's theodolite, a total station, or a laser leveling device. Prior art guide strings consist of links that are coupled end-to-end. A link is typically constructed from a metal pin that has a square cross section and a diameter of about 3.4 mm, and a locking screw that is used to couple the pins together. Guides consist of a parallel series of holes aligned with the pin. The pins are typically driven to a desired position on a suitable e79caf774b
