Because they're cheaper than local disasters, those of course are also more helpful for the global economy. Moreover, because they're cheap, they appeal to our short-term, commercial mind, and there's some evidence, if you like, that this mind is shaping the world in unpredictable ways. It cannot be denied that those in Haiti and elsewhere have been made poorer by natural disasters, but does that really tell us anything about where the economic value lies? I'm taking my cues from a comment made by Douglas R. Prothero, an anthropology professor at the University of Kansas, writing for the Manhattan Institute, on the impact of natural disasters. He argues that we should not look at natural disasters in isolation but rather as a tool to understand humanity's "tragedy of the commons". His point is that nature and the environment are a common resource that we use up and it's one that humanity needs to be less selfish about. Prothero calls this an "issue of commons or constrained cooperation", arguing that natural disasters are, in a sense, an aspect of that tragic trouble. As such, they may be instructive. Reading Prothero's short commentary on the economics of natural
