The flaws aren't the only reason to check for updates, though. Some exploits require administrative access to make money. If you take this route, it is good to know that some glitches in AES-128 and AES-192 may have been patched by updates from other vendors. That's the state of things as of this writing, and it may not remain that way for much longer. You should keep this in mind as you upgrade. With that history, it is no surprise that the CIA has been contracting with The Office of Research and Development since 2002. The two have a long history of collaborating, but the history does not include money. Microsoft and Adobe are the biggest recipients of these contracts, and so the potential for abuse is clear. The Snowden leaks and the subsequent implosion of the intelligence community have somewhat shaken the industry, but these are no less activities than the NSA and its partners have been engaged in for years. The vulnerabilities affect both Windows and Macintosh operating systems, but only the bundled updates for Microsoft Windows cover macOS as well. In all, six of the vulnerabilities in this update are in Microsoft Windows. Another 10 vulnerabilities are in Adobe Acrobat, and Adobe Acrobat Reader. The remaining five are in PDF files. The highest ranked bug is CVE-2018-15703, a memory corruption vulnerability in Adobe Acrobat Reader. Another critical bug is CVE-2018-15704, which lets attackers inject malicious code into a PDF document. Details of the exploits were not available. Three of the vulnerabilities are marked as Critical. CVE-2018-19041 impacts both Windows and macOS. Both have the same flaw that allows remote attackers to execute code on vulnerable systems. The other two are two critical flaws in Adobe Acrobat. The first exploits a use-after-free bug that can lead to code execution.
