Functional recovery of a highly branched mouse epithelial cell line during aggregate formation. The present study demonstrates that the epidermal basal cell line 1011 obtained from SENCAR mice contains two distinct sublines of epithelial cells. One type of basal cell can form colonies by aggregates. The second type of basal cell is normally well dispersed, and can form colonies only when the colony formation subline is introduced to another culture dish. In an attempt to understand the mechanism of colony formation of the basal epithelial cells, an assay for colony formation was established by preparing aggregates of basal cells in a type I collagen gel and transferring aggregates to another dish with a type IV collagen gel. This assay successfully revealed that a number of the basal cells formed colonies. The basal cells that formed colonies showed the same behavior as the colony formation subline cells during aggregate formation in the gel. In addition, this assay demonstrated that transformed cells in a monolayer suspension could also become physically incorporated into the aggregates. Although the disaggregated cell population could not form colonies, a number of these cells could form small aggregates. These small aggregates could remain in suspension for long periods, and then form colonies in gel culture, or they could attach to the substratum, and then form colonies. This latter process appeared to result in a cytologically distinct type of colony. The presence of a small number of colony formation cells in a disaggregated population strongly suggests that these cells are responsible for the aggregation and subsequent colony formation observed in the monolayer suspension

(AP) - State regulators have licensed a new wireless technology that measures drivers' attention while on the road and could offer teachers and parents a device that helps older drivers stay safe behind the wheel. The technology is called DriveSafe Connect. It helps screen drivers for distracted driving, and could enable health care providers to educate on road safety. DriveSafe Connect is a new educational app that uses speech recognition and patterns to measure driver attention, and alerts both parents and teachers when a child is distracted or unsafe behind the wheel. The company, Voice Health, says the driver 04aeff104c
