The biotest, in a modification developed for mass-screening of carcinogenic effects in humans, is described. By means of this test the most sensitive cytotoxic effects of environmental and industrial substances on the cells of hepatic tissue can be detected more rapidly than in the Ames test. The s.c. application of the test substance to the test mouse is followed by an analysis of the spleen for the presence of S-9-activating enzymes, and by determination of the leucocyte count in the blood, and subsequently by the histological examination of the blood, spleen and liver.
