The rather obvious promise of the new UI is that it's more like a "computer" with its own tools. While there are some differences, it's also entirely understandable that it's a lot more intuitive to have a full, separate folder where you store all of your Photoshop files and making it easy to get in and out of these folders with a unified interface. The new UI is actually rather similar to that of the original CS2, but it's more comprehensive than the CS2 version. The new UI also has a uniform color range for all palettes, which can make certain tasks much easier. The biggest change is that the older PSD format is replaced by the more unified Photoshop document format. Many of the tools are now a single app within the Photoshop interface, rather than a series of tools that have their own tabs. The overall design has been streamlined. It's a really good UI, and that's about all that matters. In many ways, it's similar to the PSD Render PDF feature in Photoshop, as the old PSD file format is no longer needed (presumably). I might be resistant to using any commercial product for RAW editing, but for those of us who are Photoshop users this program is just too important to let Microsoft Windows plugin issues hold us back. The last two major releases of PS (8.0 and 10.0) were both plugin-free. The release of the free trial software for Photoshop CS5 and the iLife Photo stuff was a good thing because many people were complaining that they couldn't get away from Microsoft software. I think myself that running Photoshop inside of Autodesk Architectural Desktop is an excellent idea, but I don't think it's a very good idea to have to buy PS in order to get it to work properly.
