Field of the Invention The invention relates to a method for filtration of fluids such as blood or blood products, more particularly a method and apparatus for attachment of capillary blood filters in microfluidic networks at locations which facilitate creation of pressure-driven transport of fluid by lateral pressure gradients, without the need of physical connection or increase of system's size to create pressure-driven flow. 2. Description of the Related Art Filtration of fluids is a standard method in the analysis of blood or blood products, for example. Such filtration may be performed to remove cells, proteins, viruses, or other substances from blood or blood products before measurement, to improve the measurement by eliminating particles, to remove potential contaminants for example bacteria, and to simply aid in sample collection. For example, the whole blood samples are often filtered before being sent for measurement of hematology, cell enumeration, or biochemical analysis, in order to eliminate particulates from the blood and facilitate reagent diffusion into the sample cells. Similarly, filtering or separation of various components of blood prior to measurement is commonly used in enumeration of white blood cells, red blood cells, platelets, or hemoglobin based particles. Such filtration, often performed by centrifugation of the blood or plasma at various rates, is generally performed prior to measurement or analysis of the blood product. For example,
