Just make sure that in your.xib you have a UITableViewController as the DataSource of the table view so that it receives the data source and dequeues it as the class. (UI elements don't automatically know that they have been dequeued from the nib.) The UITableView doesn't directly know anything about the contents of the file, it merely asks its delegate as to what it should display (the table view datasource). A: The files are not part of the "nib" or "xib" files that you create with Interface Builder. You need to make a file that holds the model and data for the table view, and then you'll be able to add a new table view cell view and set the data source. I just happened to find an article that dealt with the exact thing you are trying to do. It's not related to data bindings, but it might help you out, or give you
